I. Introduction

1. By letter of 9 October 2015 the Chair of the PACE Monitoring Committee, Mr Stefan Schennach, requested an opinion of the Venice Commission on the Act of 16 October 2015 amending the Organic Law no. 2/1979 on the Constitutional Court of Spain (hereinafter, "the Amendment", CDL-REF(2016)035).

2. In his letter, Mr Schennach requested that the opinion not be made public before the parliamentary elections in Spain on 20 December 2015. The Commission therefore envisaged the adoption of the opinion for its session in March 2016 and a visit of the rapporteurs was planned for February 2016. However, in view of the difficulties of forming a Government in Spain, a visit of the rapporteurs to Madrid was postponed from February to April 2016 in the hope of being able to meet, inter alia with the newly formed Government.

3. An appeal by the Government of the Basque Region and by the Catalan region against the Amendment was pending before the Constitutional Court since 30 December 2015. As the Amendment concerns the very Law on the Constitutional Court, the Commission decided to continue working on the opinion while the case was pending before the Court.

4. A delegation of the Venice Commission composed of Mr Grabenwarter and Mr Neppi Modona, accompanied by Mr Dürr and Ms Ubeda de Torres from the Secretariat, visited Madrid on 25 April 2016 and had meetings with the Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Commission of the Congress of Deputies, the General Council of the Judiciary, the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Justice (of the caretaker Government as still no new Government had been formed) and with academics. Following the visit, the Government provided a position paper (CDL-REF(2016)034, hereinafter "the Position Paper"). The Venice Commission is grateful to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the excellent organisation of this visit.

5. Shortly after the visit, new parliamentary elections were called for June 2016 and the Commission postponed the adoption of the opinion to its session in October 2016. In September 2016 the President of the Constitutional Court informed the President of the Venice Commission that the Court was about to hand down its judgment in a case brought against the Amendment by the Governments of the Basque and the Catalan Regions and he requested that the Venice Commission postpone the adoption of its opinion on the Amendment until these judgments had been adopted. The Bureau of the Commission agreed to that request. The Court's Judgment STC 185/2016 in the case brought by the Basque Region was publicly announced on 3 November 2016 (hereinafter "Judgment STC 185/2016", CDL-REF(2016)001). The case brought by the Catalan Region was handed down on 15 December 2016 as Judgement STC 215/2016 (hereinafter "Judgement STC 215/2016", CDL-REF(2017)007).

6. The rapporteurs prepared their comments on the basis of the English translations of the Amendment made available by the Spanish authorities and the results of the visit to Madrid. The translation may not accurately reflect the original version on all points. Some of the issues raised may therefore find their cause in the translation rather than in the substance of the provisions concerned.

7. The present opinion was adopted by the Venice Commission at its ... plenary session (Venice, ...).

II. General remarks

8. From the outset, the Venice Commission recalls that judgments of Constitutional Courts have a final and binding character and they have to be respected by all public bodies and individuals.¹ This is a corollary of the supremacy of the Constitution. Disregarding a judgment of a Constitutional Court is disregarding the Constitution and the Constituent Power, which attributed the competence to guarantee this Constitution's supremacy to the Constitutional Court. When a public official refuses to execute a judgment of the Constitutional Court, he or she violates the principle of loyal cooperation of state organs² and measures to enforce this judgment are legitimate. This opinion examines to which extent the Amendment is an appropriate means to achieve this legitimate objective.

9. During the meetings in Madrid, interlocutors from the opposition insisted that Organic Law 15/2015 had been adopted in an accelerated procedure without sufficient time for discussion. During the meetings and in its Position Paper, the Government insisted that the draft had been introduced by a political group in Parliament and not as a Government proposal. Therefore, the accelerated procedure with the adoption of the organic law in a single reading was validly applied and numerous amendments to the draft had been introduced and been debated.

10. The constitutionality of the adoption of the law under the accelerated procedure has been confirmed by the Constitutional Court in its Judgments. Referring to its earlier case-law,³ the Court stated in Judgment STC 215/2016 that "the particular constitutional relevance of a regulatory text, in light of said regulation article, is not incompatible with its processing in a summary procedure, or is sufficient per se [...] to exclude the use of this parliamentary procedure, from which no matter is excluded, including constitutional reform". The Venice Commission has no reason to doubt the constitutionality of the procedure followed. As concerns European standards, the Venice Commission recalls that institutional legislation, like that on the Constitutional Court, needs thorough scrutiny and the opinions of all relevant stakeholders should be considered. Even if Parliament is not obliged to follow their views, this input can avoid technical errors, which can defeat the purpose of the legislation.⁴

11. The Position Paper explains that the amendments to Organic Law 15/2015 are part of a wider reform and effort to ensure the execution of the judgments of Spanish high courts and those of the European Court of Human Rights, which were triggered inter alia by the judgment in the case of García Mateos v. Spain.⁵ Other elements of this reform are:

1. Act 25/2014 of 27 November 2014 on Treaties and other International Agreements, which attributes a rank above ordinary law to obligations derived from international treaties ratified by Spain. According to the Position Paper, this Law also obliges Spain to abide by the final judgments of the European Court of Human Rights.
2. Procedural legislation ensuring the re-opening of proceedings following a judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (Organic Law 7/2015 of 21 July 2015 and Act 41/2015 of 5 October 2015 amending various other acts).

12. The Position Paper also explains the need for the Amendment with the refusal of the Parliament of Catalonia to respect judgments of the Constitutional Court.⁶ Nearly all the interlocutors of the Commission's delegation referred, more or less explicitly, to the separatist movement in Catalonia as the political reason for the adoption of the Amendment.

13. During the meetings in Madrid, the Venice Commission was informed that in case of a refusal to execute a decision of the Constitutional Court, the new procedure under the Amendments to the Organic Law was likely to be invoked before measures were taken as a last resort under Article 155 of the Constitution, which enables the Government, following approval by the Senate, to take all measures necessary to compel the self-governing community concerned to meet its obligations or to protect the general interest.

14. The Amendment is formulated in an abstract manner and does not refer to the situation in Catalonia. Therefore, even if the execution of judgments of the Constitutional Court relating to Catalonia might become the first occasion to apply the law, its provisions are of a general normative nature and will be examined as such by the Commission and not in respect of the Catalan case. This was also the approach by the Constitutional Court in its Judgments STC 185/2016 and STC 215/2016.

III. Comparative overview⁷

15. The respective jurisdiction and institutional setting of the various constitutional courts in Europe vary widely. In particular, the rules on the execution of judgments, where such rules exist at all, differ for every constitutional court. As a consequence, there are no strict common standards on the execution of judgments of constitutional courts.⁸

16. In some States, there is no judicial review of legislation at all, such as for instance in the Netherlands⁹ or in the United Kingdom. In others, the Supreme Court exercises constitutional control, for instance in Cyprus, in Estonia (the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court), in Norway or in Ireland. Typically, the general rules on execution apply also in these cases.

⁶ Resolution 1/XI of 9 November 2015, later annulled by the Constitutional Court by judgment 259/2015.

⁹ See Article 120 of the Dutch Constitution. With the exception of constitutional review of legislation for the Caribbean islands Aruba and Curacao.

17. The decisions of the Constitutional Court are usually final and binding. For example, Article 171 of the Constitution of Serbia determines that everyone shall be obliged to observe and enforce the decisions of the Constitutional Court. Similar regulations can be found in the legal orders of Albania,¹⁰ Croatia,¹¹ Hungary¹² and Lithuania.¹³ Article 150 of the Constitution of Ukraine states that decisions of the Constitutional Court are mandatory for execution throughout the territory of Ukraine and that they are final and shall not be appealed.

18. According to Section 31 para. 1 of the German Law on the Federal Constitutional Court, the decisions are binding on the constitutional organs of the Federation and the Länder as well as on all courts and administrative authorities. Para. 2 goes one step further for certain types of proceedings (in particular various types of norm control proceedings, but also proceedings on individual complaints against judgments). It stipulates that the decision has the „force of law” (Gesetzeskraft).

19. In Liechtenstein, enforcement of the judgments of the Constitutional Court is governed by the provisions of the Law on General Procedures of the National Administration. Monetary payments constitute an order of execution under the provisions of the Execution Act.¹⁴

20. According to the legal order in some States, the enforcement is monitored by the Constitutional Court itself. According to Article 52 of the Constitution of Montenegro, the authority which is obliged to execute the decision of the Constitutional Court shall, after the expiry of a certain time-limit, submit a report to the Constitutional Court on the execution of decisions of the Constitutional Court. According to Article 87 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court of "The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia", the Court monitors the execution of its judgments, and if necessary, may request the Government of the Republic of Macedonia to ensure their execution.

21. In the legal order of some States such as for instance Austria, Croatia,¹⁵ Montenegro or Serbia,¹⁶ it falls to the executive (government or administration) to enforce the decisions of the Constitutional Court. In Austria, according to Article 146 of the Federal Constitutional Law, the enforcement of judgments of the Constitutional Court concerning pecuniary claims against the Federation, the provinces, the municipalities and municipal associations which cannot be settled by ordinary legal process nor be liquidated by the ruling of an administrative authority is implemented by the ordinary courts. The enforcement of other judgments by the Constitutional Court is incumbent on the Federal President. The Constitutional Court is therefore reliant on the assistance of other state authorities, mainly the Federal President who may deploy the Federal Army in order to execute the decisions of the Constitutional Court. This is, however, a mere theoretical option, as decisions are rarely not followed. The Austrian system is based on the assumption that the execution of decisions of a Constitutional Court is a highly political matter and should therefore not be exercised by the Constitutional Court itself.¹⁷

22. Article 86 of the Rules of Procedure of the Constitutional Court of "The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia" provides that judgments of the Constitutional Court are executed by the entity that passed the act that is annulled or repealed by a judgment of the Court. According to Article 46 of the Law on the Constitutional Court of Serbia, the Court can determine the manner of enforcement of its decisions or rulings.

23. In Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court itself may decide which administrative body shall execute its decisions. According to Article 35 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act, the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court may specify who is to execute it; in individual cases, it may also specify the method of execution. Article 35 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act has the same aim as Article 146 of the Austrian Federal Constitutional Law: The decision-making body and the executive body should be separated because of the highly political nature of the enforcement procedure and its arrangement in specific cases.¹⁸

24. In the majority of European States, however, there are no explicit rules on the consequences of non-compliance with the decisions of the Constitutional Court. This is due to the fact that, in “older” democracies, there have been only a few real cases of non-compliance.¹⁹

25. In a number of States such as Armenia,²⁰ Moldova²¹ and Ukraine²² the law provides for legal (criminal or civil) sanctions in the event of non-compliance. In Albania, persons who do not implement or who prevent the execution of decisions of the Constitutional Court are fined up to 100.000 Lek [around € 700] by the President of the Constitutional Court, unless the case constitutes a criminal offence. This decision is final and constitutes a writ of execution.²³ In a similar way, in Moldova, the Constitutional Court may impose an administrative fine amounting to 25 minimal salaries in the case of non-enforcement of the decisions of the Court.²⁴

26. The comparative overview provided above shows that there is some diversity with respect to the execution of judgments. One part of the European legal order does not regulate the enforcement of Constitutional Court decisions and the other assigns this task to the executive branch. As a consequence, there are no European standards on who should be responsible for the execution of Constitutional Court decisions.

IV. Assessment of the Amendment to Organic Law 2/1979 of 3 October 1979

27. Before the introduction of the Amendment, the Organic Law 2/1979 of 3 October 1979 already contained provisions on the execution of the judgments of the Constitutional Court.

1. Article 87 provided that all public powers were bound by the judgments of the Constitutional Court and that ordinary courts had to give urgent preferential treatment to requests by the Court;
2. Article 92 provided that the Constitutional Court was able to deal with questions of execution in its judgment or resolution or in later acts;
3. Article 95, provided that the Court was able to impose coercive penalties ranging between 5000 and 100 000 Pesetas (about 30 and 600 Euros) on any person – private or public – who does not execute the request of the Court within the requested deadline. These coercive penalties may be repeated until the fulfilment of the obligation by the person concerned, notwithstanding any other responsibility of that person.

²¹ Article 28¹ of the Law on the Constitutional Court.

²² Article 70 of the Law on the Constitutional Court.

²³ Article 81.4 of the Constitutional Court Act

²⁴ Art 82 of the Constitutional Jurisdiction Code

28. The Preamble to the Amendments and the Position Paper explain that these provisions were not sufficient to ensure the execution of the decisions of the Constitutional Court and that the Law needed to be adapted to ensure the effectiveness of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, notably when public authorities refuse to comply with the Court's decisions.

29. The Preamble also emphasises that "the guarantee of effectiveness constitutes an essential element without which the rule of law would not exist" and that under the new provisions "the Court may undertake the execution of its decisions either directly or through any other public authority". The Amendment significantly increases the powers attributed to the Constitutional Court for the execution of its decisions. Articles 80, 87, 92 and 95²⁵ are amended.

A. Subsidiary application of the Law on Contentious-Administrative Jurisdiction

30. Article 80, which provided that the Organic Law on the Judiciary and the Code of Civil Procedure apply to various procedural aspects, was amended to apply, in addition, the Law on Contentious-Administrative Jurisdiction²⁶ as a supplementary law to the enforcement of decisions.

31. This provision may be relevant in combination with other amendments, notably Article 87 which makes Constitutional Court decisions executable titles and Article 92 as concerns procedural guarantees when penalty payments are imposed and when officials are suspended (see below).

B. Notification of decisions

32. Article 87.1 was amended to provide that the Constitutional Court may notify its decisions ("acordar la notificación") "in person to any public authority or employee deemed necessary".

33. The power to notify the decisions to any public authority and employee is consistent with the final and binding character of the decisions of the Constitutional Court. The organs and persons which have an obligation to execute decisions of the Court need to be notified so that they are aware of their obligation and can fulfil this obligation in an efficient and speedy manner. Such notification can remove doubts as to which authority or person is responsible to execute a decision and thus avoid positive or negative conflicts of competence in the execution. Such notification should not only be optional, but be an obligation for the Constitutional Court.

34. The original Article 87 already provided that the ordinary courts shall assist the Constitutional Court as a matter of priority and urgency. The amended Article 87.2 also provides that "[f]or that purpose, all judgments and decisions of the Constitutional Court shall be considered enforceable titles."

35. This provision remains unclear as to the effects of making the Constitutional Court decisions enforceable titles. While the Constitutional Court itself applies the Law on Contentious-Administrative Jurisdiction as a supplementary law, the scope of that Law refers to administrative courts.²⁷ As a consequence, the ordinary courts do not have an explicit basis for the execution of the decisions of the Constitutional Court. The Amendment should regulate this point in a clearer manner.

²⁵ Article 95 is amended only insofar as the coercive fines foreseen are removed from that article because they are now regulated in Article 92.

²⁷ Articles 2 and 6.

C. Attribution to the Constitutional Court of the task to ensure the execution of its decisions

36. The amended Article 92 attributes to the Court the task of ensuring the execution of its decisions. During execution, the Court may annul any decision contradicting its own decisions after hearing the Public Prosecutor and the authority that issued the [contravening] decision (para. 1).

37. The Constitutional Court may request the assistance of any public administration or public authority in order to ensure the effectiveness of its decisions, which shall be provided as a matter of priority and urgency (para. 2).

38. The parties of the proceedings before the Constitutional Court may promote [submit] enforcement issues (“promover el incidente de ejecución”) as established in para. 1 proposing to the Court the adoption of the necessary enforcement measures to ensure the effective compliance with its decisions” (para. 3).

39. The attribution of the task to ensure the execution of its decisions in Article 92 is the heart of the Amendments. As the comparative overview has shown, this task is rather exceptional for European Constitutional Courts. While some Courts have the task of monitoring the execution of their judgments or may assign the task of execution to a specific organ or body, no other Court seems to have the overall responsibility of ensuring the execution of its judgments itself.

40. What the obligation to ensure the execution of its decision really means, according to the Spanish Organic Law, depends on the measures which the Court can take to ensure this execution. These will be examined below.

D. Competence to annul any decision contradicting a decision of the Constitutional Court

41. Article 92 para. 1 maintains the provision that the Court may determine within the judgment or decision, or in subsequent acts who shall be responsible for the execution. This provision serves the effectiveness of the Court’s case law and, therefore, is a useful instrument for securing implementation of decisions.

42. The Amendment adds a new competence in para 1 according to which the Court can annul ‘any’ decision contradicting its own decision.

43. Even if the parties may request the Court to annul these decisions according to para. 3, this seems to be a competence which the Court can exercise on its own initiative. In order to avoid the impression that the Court acts on behalf of its own institutional interest, this competence should be exercised only upon request by a party.

44. This competence might also overburden the Court. The Amendment makes no distinction between contradicting decisions taken before the Constitutional Court gave its own decision and later ones, which will indeed knowingly contradict the Court’s decision. There could be many individual decisions which contradict a given Constitutional Court decision. The scope ratione temporis of the competence to annul any decision contradicting a decision of the Constitutional Court should be clarified.

45. It is positive that the Constitutional Court may seek the assistance of any public administration or public authority (para. 2).

E. Procedure in case of non-execution

46. Article 92 para. 4 provides that, in case of non-compliance with one of its decisions, the Constitutional Court may request the institutions, authorities, public employees or private persons responsible for the enforcement to inform [report to] the Court within a certain time limit set by the Court. Once the report is received or the time limit expired, the Constitutional Court may adopt certain measures, if it finds that its decision remains fully or partly unfulfilled. These measures are:

1. Imposition of a coercive penalty payment from € 3.000 to € 30.000 on the authorities, public employees or private persons failing to comply with the decision of the Constitutional Court, with the possibility of reapplying the penalty until the decision is fully enforced;
2. Suspension of any public authorities or civil servants who are responsible for the non-compliance until the decision is implemented;
3. Substitute enforcement of the decision of the Constitutional Court;
4. Production of “certified copies of the particulars of the case in order to call for the criminal responsibilities that may correspond.”

47. The procedure foreseen in paragraph 4 of Article 92 has two stages, a reporting stage and a stage on measures by the Court in case of non-fulfilment. As such, the obligation to report to the Constitutional Court is not problematic, as long as the time limits set by the Court are reasonable.

F. Penalty payments

48. Coercive penalty payments already existed in the Organic Law before the Amendments in its Article 95. The Amendments, however, substantially increased the amounts of these payments from between 30 and 600 Euros to between 3.000 and 30.000 Euros (a 50-fold increase for the upper limit of the penalty).

49. The coercive penalty payments may be repeated until the decision of the Constitutional Court is executed. The Amendments do not clarify whether it is the authority that has to pay the penalty or the office-holder from his or her personal funds. In Judgment 215/2016, the Constitutional Court seems to contemplate only individuals when it refers to salaries and states that the “subjective scope of application is not limited to authorities or public employees, but also covers any citizens failing to follow the Court’s resolutions; consequently, based on the salary of public employees, it cannot be affirmed in principle that the amounts set are always, irresistibly and necessarily, disproportionate”.

50. According to the Judgments of the Constitutional Court, they do not have penal character under the Spanish Constitution. In Judgment 215/2016, the Court held that “it is not a sanctioning measure in strict terms, as it does not have a repressive or retributive purpose due to an illegal conduct, but acts as coercion or encouragement to fulfil a legal duty, in other words, to dissuade its non-fulfilment. Thus, no matter how burdensome the consequence of the disputed measure for the person ordered to fulfil it, it does not follow a strictly repressive, retributive or punishment purpose, the defining features of punitive measures, but aims at guaranteeing the effectiveness and fulfilment of Constitutional Court resolutions”.

51. As concerns the Convention, notably because of the level of these penalties, they may be considered to be “criminal charges” under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, if the other criteria of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights are fulfilled, at least as far as private persons are concerned and there are good reasons that call for a similar assessment where public employees are concerned. Conversely, when a fine is imposed on an authority, which is to be paid from the budget of that authority,²⁸ seems difficult to establish the penal character of the sanction within the meaning of Article 6 ECHR.

52. As a consequence, the fair trial guarantees of Article 6 ECHR are required for penalty payments imposed on individuals. The application of the Law on Contentious-Administrative Jurisdiction and, notably, its provisions on hearings and on evidence may provide such guarantees. It is for the Constitutional Court to apply them appropriately in individual cases.

53. The main issue of the penalty payments is whether they can be enforced. The measures under Article 92 para. 4 apply only when the authority or person concerned already refused to abide by the final and binding decision of the Constitutional Court and the request for a report on the execution does not result in its execution. This amounts to questioning the Constitutional Court's authority.

54. There is no doubt that an overt refusal to execute the decisions of the Constitutional Court constitutes a flagrant violation of the Constitution and that this needs to be remedied. The question is why an authority, which already violated the Constitution by refusing to execute a final and binding decision of the Constitution, would abide by another decision of the Constitutional Court imposing a penalty payment. It is possible that this authority would not respect this measure either.

55. Such a flagrant and repetitive disrespect of the Constitutional Court's decisions can severely undermine its authority and, in turn, that of the Constitution. Once the Constitutional Court has made a decision and there is a refusal to implement this decision, other bodies should step in, in order to defend the Constitution and the Constitutional Court. Giving the power of execution of its decisions to the Constitutional Court may seem as an increase of power at first sight. However, in a system of separation of powers, the division of competences of adjudicating on the one hand, and of executing its results, strengthens the system of checks and balances as a whole, and in the end, also the independence of the Constitutional Court as a decisive factor of the rule of law. The perpetrator should certainly be punished, but not by the Constitutional Court, which does not have the practical means to force the office holder to comply with its decision.

G. Suspension of officials

56. The Amendment allows the Constitutional Court to suspend any public authority or civil servant who is responsible for the non-compliance of a decision of the Court until that decision is implemented. A series of questions arise in this respect.

57. First, after the discussions during the Venice Commission's visit to Madrid and even after the Judgments STC 185/2016 and STC 215/2016, it remains unclear whether this suspension refers only to civil servants, to elected officials or also to judges. The Judgments point out that the Court will decide on a case by case basis, while insisting all public bodies are bound by Constitution.

58. According to the Venice Commission, notably the suspension of judges would be problematic, not only because judges benefit from special constitutional guarantees as to their tenure (Article 117 of the Spanish Constitution), but especially because the purpose of the suspension is to force the person concerned to execute the decision of the Constitutional Court. For a judge, this would mean forcing the judge to make a judgment in a given manner. This would violate the constitutional guarantee of the independence of the judge concerned.

²⁸ The Amendments do not clarify whether it is the authority that has to pay the penalty or the office-holder from his or her personal funds.

59. The suspension of Members of Parliament who have a democratic mandate from the sovereign people could also be problematic. The suspension of civil servants and not directly elected office holders seems less problematic. The Organic Law should clearly define the personal scope of suspension.

60. In the light of the Eskelinen-case law,²⁹ the suspension of any public authorities or administrative employees is also likely to concern a “civil right” leading to the applicability of Article 6 ECHR. As a consequence, fair trial particular guarantees would be required (public hearing, equality of arms etc.). The subsidiary application of the Law on Contentious-Administrative Jurisdiction might provide the necessary guarantees.

61. It can be presumed that the Constitutional Court would apply the measure of suspension of an official – as temporary measure – within the framework of the guarantees provided for by the Constitution and the Convention.

62. Another issue is the effect of the suspension. During the suspension, the suspended office holder cannot exercise his or her powers. In itself, the suspension does not result in the replacement of the person concerned with another office holder. According to the Preamble of the Amendments and the Position Paper, the suspension – like the penalty payments - should induce the suspended office holder to execute the decision of the Constitutional Court and the suspension should last only while the officeholder refuses to execute the decision of the Constitutional Court. However, if the office-holder can no longer exercise his or her powers, how is he or she expected to execute the Court’s decision? Judgment STC 215/2016 states that the measure will be lifted when the authority or public official is no longer “unwilling” to comply. In order to solve that problem, it would seem necessary that the office-holder first promise to execute the decision; the Court would then end the suspension in order to enable the execution by the office holder. The Amendments should address this practical question.

63. This issue may be moot if the rules governing the office of the suspended official provides for the official’s (his or her deputy) substitution and the substitute executes the Constitutional Court’s decision. Then the suspension of the office holder would end. If however the substitute in turn refuses to execute the decision, he or she should probably be suspended as well. This could be repeated until the decision is executed. Such repeated suspension could lead to an absurd situation.

64. Finally, the same problem arises as for the penalty payments. If the decision of the Constitutional Court is not executed, then it is possible that the office holder concerned would also ignore his or her suspension and remain in office. This would seriously undermine the authority of the Constitutional Court.

H. Substitute enforcement

65. Article 92 para. 4 item 3 provides for substitute enforcement of the Constitutional Court’s decisions. The Constitutional Court may request the cooperation of the National Government in this case.

66. The Government of the Basque Region claimed that the substitute enforcement changed the nature of the system of supervision of the self-governing communities by the Spanish State. In Judgment STC 185/2016, the Constitutional Court rejects this claim and makes a clear distinction between the measures of execution under the Amendment and the measures under Article 155 of the Spanish Constitution, which enable the Government to take measures against self-governing communities which do not follow their constitutional or legal obligations when this is “seriously prejudicial to the general interest of Spain”. These measures are taken by the Spanish Government “following approval granted by the overall majority of the Senate”. They are taken by political actors. The measures of execution under the Amendment on the other hand are taken by the Constitutional Court, a judicial organ, in cases of the non-execution of one of its judgments. As such, they do not relate to the system of supervision of autonomous communities under Article 155 of the Constitution and do not denature this system as had been alleged by the Basque Government.

67. The Venice Commission is of the opinion that substitute enforcement of decisions of the Constitutional Court is not problematic. The Constitutional Court is likely not to execute this measure itself, but to request the cooperation of the Spanish Government. Therefore, the Court is not itself burdened with performing the required acts.

I. Certified copies as a basis for criminal prosecution

68. Article 92 para. 4 item 4 provides for the production of certified copies presenting the details of the case concerned for the purpose of enabling criminal prosecution of the persons refusing the execution of the decision.

69. The certificates are the basis for the prosecution service and the ordinary courts and they are, as such, not problematic. The burden of execution would in this case shift to the prosecution service and to the ordinary judiciary, which is welcome.

J. Suspension of acts

70. In cases of special constitutional importance,³⁰ Article 92 para. 5 empowers the Constitutional Court to suspend acts at its own motion or at the request of the Government. The Court suspends such acts without hearing the parties. However, in the decision on such measures, the Court summons the parties and the Public Prosecutor within three days. After such a hearing, the Court decides on lifting, maintaining or modifying these (provisional) measures.

71. The suspension of acts without hearing the parties could be an issue, notably if the case were to fall under the scope of Article 6 ECHR. However, a hearing is held already three days after this measure is taken and the parties concerned can express their views at that hearing. Often, Constitutional Courts or even their Presidents can adopt interim measures in urgent cases. Therefore, there is no objection against this measure, given that a hearing is held shortly after the measure is taken. However, the Court should not act on its own motion but only upon request.

V. Conclusions

72. As a corollary of the supremacy of the Constitution, judgments of Constitutional Courts have to be respected by all public bodies and individuals. Disregarding a judgment of a Constitutional Court is equivalent to disregarding the Constitution and the Constituent Power, which attributed the competence to ensure this supremacy to the Constitutional Court. Measures to enforce these judgments are therefore legitimate. This opinion examines to which extent the Amendment introduced by Organic Law no. 2/1979 on the Constitutional Court of Spain is an appropriate means to achieve this legitimate objective.

73. The Amendment attributes to the Constitutional Court the task of executing its decisions. When there is a refusal to execute a decision of the Court, the Court may take a series of measures, including imposing repetitive coercive penalties and suspending the official refusing execution.

74. The comparative overview shows that the responsibility for the Constitutional Court to ensure execution its own decisions is the exception. This task is usually attributed to other state powers. Attributing the overall and direct responsibility for the execution of the Constitutional Court's decision to the Court itself should be reconsidered, since it could lead to the perception – be it justified or not – in the public that the Court pursues its own institutional interests behind a particular decision rather than being a neutral arbiter as judge of the laws.

75. Several of the measures which the Constitutional Court can take when it encounters a refusal to execute one of its decisions do not raise any problems, for instance requesting the National Government to substitute the execution or requesting the prosecution and the ordinary courts to initiate criminal proceedings. There is also no objection to the Court requesting information or reports on the execution of its decisions. The effects of making Constitutional Court decision executable titles should be regulated more clearly.

76. However, two measures raise questions: the repetitive, coercive penalty payments and the suspension from office of officials who refuse to execute the Courts' decisions.

77. The personal scope of the suspension from office remains unclear and should be specified. It would be problematic if it were to include judges or directly elected officials, as the wording of Article 92 seems to indicate.

78. In order to avoid the impression that the Court acts on behalf of its own institutional interest, the Court should not act on its own motion but only upon request by a party in exercising the execution powers under the Amendment,

79. However, another serious concern against attributing to the Constitutional Court the task of executing its own decisions is that the Court has to take these measures – coercive penalty payments and suspension of officials – in a situation where the Court is already facing a refusal to execute its decisions. It is not unlikely that the person refusing the execution will also refuse to pay the penalty or ignore the suspension and continue exercising his or her office. This could challenge the authority of the Constitutional Court and, in turn, that of the Constitution itself.

80. The Venice Commission does not recommend that these powers be attributed to the Constitutional Court. However, in the light of the absence of common European standards in this field, the introduction of such powers does not contradict such standards.

81. The Venice Commission remains at the disposal of the Spanish authorities for any further assistance they may require.
